

Dear DIARY

SWEDEN

The size of Sweden

>8.9 million inhabitants occupy the fourth largest country in Europe. If you >were to swing Sweden round at 180° using the southernmost tip as the axis, >you could reach central Italy no problem. Mind you, the Sami (Laplanders) >would want to know what they were suddenly doing in Naples. travel by >sleeper. This means that not many Swedes know what their country looks like.
>They either fly 10 000 metres above it or sleep through it.

Geography

>
>The southern part of Sweden is the most densely populated and is inhabited >by people called Scanians, a kind of Swedish-speaking Dane. They are proud >to tell you that they were once a part of Denmark and that they have >absolutely nothing in common with the rest of the country. Indeed they are >geographically closer to Berlin than to Stockholm. The southern part of >Sweden is the gateway to Europe and the rest of the world. Or at least to >Copenhagen for a good night out.

>The north of Sweden is inhabited by northerners (Norrlänningar) and the Sami >(Laplanders), an ancient hunting and fishing nomadic people who live in >tents and speak a Finno-Urgic language they themselves can hardly >understand. This is perhaps why they hardly say anything at all. Norrland, >as this area is called, stretches across 60% of Sweden and is so sparsely >populated that the inhabitants hardly ever meet anyone to talk to.

>

>In central Sweden lies the capital, Stockholm. Stockholm is inhabited by >'zero eights', so called because of their telephone area codes. 'Zero >eights' have a reputation for being like sea-gulls, they scream and cause a >mess wherever they go. Well, that's what the Swedish-speaking Danes say in >the south. The people of the north haven't said a word. As usual.

The Swedish summer

>

>The Swedish summer is the warmest day of the year. And as Sweden is a very >normal country, it is normal for the Swedish summer to be a bit colder than >normal.

The Swedish winter

>

>The geography book will tell you that, although the country is on the same >latitude as Alaska, Sweden has a mild climate and the Atlantic Gulf stream >gives warm winters. The truth is that there are two types of winter in >Sweden. A grey one and a white one. Swedes survive the winter only by >dreaming of what they are going to do on that summer's day.

>

Sweden - a peace-loving nation

>

>Sweden is a peace-loving country. There is, after all, such a thing as the >Nobel Peace Prize. Having invented dynamite, gelignite and nitroglycerine, >and other substances enough to blow the earth out of the solar system, the >Swede Alfred Nobel got a guilty conscience and used his profits to set up >the Nobel Foundation.

>

>The Swedes are neutral because they say they are. They are the conscience of >the world and therefore only sell peaceful weapons. Preferably to be used as >fireworks.

>Europa!

>For most Swedes Europe starts on the other side of the Sound in Copenhagen.
>Sweden joined the EU in 1995, although most of them would have preferred the >EU to join Sweden on their terms. 99% of the Swedes are now soberly against >the EU as it is no longer possible to buy tax-free spirits and cigarettes >when travelling from one EU country to another. For, up to now, it has >always been the duty of every Swede to buy his ration both on the way out >and on the way back. Once at a hotel in one of Europe's exciting >metropolises, Swedes used to gather, lock themselves up in the room and >drink duty-free booze out of the toothbrush glass. The fact that bar prices >in Europe are usually considerably lower than even Swedish tax-free prices >never occurred to them.

>

>Scandinavian neighbors

>

>As Victor Borge, the Danish entertainer, once said. Some things are better >in Sweden than in Denmark. The Swedes have better neighbors.

>

>Norway is very sparsely inhabited and has an average of three inhabitants per >mountain. Norway always regarded itself as the little brother of Sweden >until someone pointed out that if you flattened all the mountains, the >country would be fifty times larger than its big brother. That and earning >zillions of crowns from North Sea oil has done wonders to raise Norwegian >self-esteem.

>

>Swedish politics

>

>Swedes are liberal, yet they always vote for the social democrats. That's >because they are so conservative. Or, as the well-known saying goes, the >Swedes are a colorful people. They think blue, vote red and eat green.

>

>Swedish tax

>

>Governments in Sweden have spent years convincing Swedes that their money >isn't really their own. But the Swede is a person of great initiative and >has developed a few ways of keeping a few crowns for himself. Nobody is >allowed to get rich. If people in other countries see someone drive round in >a flashy sports car, they may exclaim 'Wow! What a cool guy!' In Sweden >they'll say 'What a tax-dodger'.

>

>Business climate in Sweden

>

>In the USA business people go to their therapist's after a nervous >breakdown. In Sweden people running their own businesses go to their >accountant's.

>

>Swedish business culture

>

>Swedish managers want to be normal people and one of the team. That is why >they like to be called by their first names; Bengan, Maggan, Bosse and Kalle >by their staff. They never shut their office door and they even queue up in >the same canteen as the workers and eat the same food. They like to think of >themselves more as a coach than a commander. Swedish management delegates >responsibility and authority throughout the organization. Over 80% of Swedes >have some form of vocational training and staff are therefore quite capable >of taking initiative and participating in the decision-making. For >foreigners it's sometimes difficult to know who's in charge around here.
>Lasse in his open-necked, short-sleeved, yellow shirt and white socks and >sneakers, doesn't really look the part.

>

>Swedish inventions

>

>Sweden gave the world ball-bearings, safety matches, adjustable wrenches, >safety belts, Tetra Paks, Volvo and Saab. It also makes and exports Absolut >vodka, which is rather ironic as the Swedish word for teetotalers is >'Absolutist'. Ikea, of course, is also Swedish. If the social democrats >created the welfare state, commonly referred to as 'the home of the people', >then Ikea furnished it.

>

>Swedish schedules

>

>The Bible of the modern Swede is his filofax. Everything he has to do for >the next six months is meticulously written down. Take kids to day care, >drop of suit for cleaning, ring dentist, meeting with sales team, fax >figures, lunch with Bengan, meeting, pick up car, drive home, take off >shoes, shout at kids. It's all in there - every movement. All planned and >organised down to the very last minute. If a Swede misplaces his filofax >then he loses direction in life - he simply does not know what to do next.

>

>Everything is planned weeks in advance and written down next to the times it >has to be performed. Flexibility is not the name of the game here. Once >written in, then it will be done. Swedes are impressed by filofaxes which >are full and overflowing. A chock-a-block filofax is a status symbol. The >next time you want to arrange a meeting with a Swede, watch how he >instinctively reaches for his filofax, opens it in January and flicks >through week after week, month after month of crammed appointments finally >to stop in October some time. Then something will happen. Your Swedish >business partner will mutter something like 'Is week 37 OK? I can squeeze >you in in week 38'. Swedes count weeks. Each week has a number. Ask the >average Swede when week 29 is and he hasn't got a clue. But that gives him >another excuse to reach for his filofax and start flicking through.

>

>He'll find that it's in July, in the middle of his holiday and therefore he >couldn't care less what the number of the week is.

>

>000101

>

>Swedes write the date backwards. Year first, then month and then day. Nobody >says the date that way, but Swedes are sure it's the right way to write it.

>Everybody has a national registration number with ten digits based on the >date of their birth and a few extra ones, such as 581023-6879. Or as one >Swede put it "It's the day, month and year when you were born backwards and >then followed by four figures". Childbirth is a painful business in Sweden.

>

>The Social Swede

>

>Swedish homes

>

>These are usually very tasteful, yet simply furnished. Swedish homes are >simple, clean and uncluttered. Foreign guests very often ask 'How nice. When >are you moving in?' Swedes have good taste in furniture and home-decorating.
>Walls are usually painted in a plain colour and the sofa, the carpets, and >the curtains all match. Indeed, when they entertain at home, even the >candles match the curtains, which match the table cloth which matches the >serviettes which often match the hostess's dress.

>

>Invited to dinner - 1

>

>They take the paper off a bunch of flowers before they ring the doorbell of >their hosts for the evening. It's rather like unwrapping a Christmas present >before you give it to someone. Nobody ever knows where to put the paper once >they've screwed it up. Usually the hostess end up taking it. A bunch of >pretty flowers in one hand and a soggy, screwed up piece of wrapping paper >in the other.

>

>Invited to dinner - 2

>

>The person sitting next to you at the dinner table will offer you a lump of >butter on a wooden knife. It is not some ancient superstitious Viking ritual >whereby the knife has to be passed once round the table. It's quite simply >the height of politeness to offer your neighbor some butter on a knife. What >you do if there's not enough butter on the knife or if there is some left >over, goodness knows. But there's no need to pass it on to the next person >as he's busy handing butter to someone else.

>

>Invited to dinner - 3

>

>Swedes are very polite guests. They show much appreciation for the food.

>They guess the ingredients, enquire how it was cooked, wonder where the >ingredients were bought and ask how long it needed in the oven. In fact, >most guests ask for the recipe and this is the greatest of compliments. They >eat and mutter 'This was good' which is rather strange as they are still >eating it.

>

>At the restaurant - 1

>

>You are forced to hang up your coat when entering a restaurant as it is >infested with all sorts of harmful bacteria. For this pleasure you are >expected to pay. Why should you pay? To pay the cloakroom attendant. Why >have a cloakroom attendant? If they didn't there'd be no-one to take your 15 >crowns. Get it?

>

>At the restaurant - 2

>

>Swedes believe in fairness. No-one should be in debt to anyone else.

>Consequently they insist on all paying their fair share at the restaurant >when the bill comes. Who had what and how much takes forever to work out and >is not made easier by the fact that nobody at that stage has a clear head.

>Lengthy calculations on a serviette and countless restarts later, they've >worked out how much each person owes down to the last krona. This is when >several in the group realize they need to take out an instant bank loan.

>

>Swedish alcohol policy

>

>The Swedes do have an alcohol problem. It's so expensive that no-one can >afford it. How can anyone afford to get drunk, let alone become an >alcoholic? The 'Systembolaget' (the system company) is the national retail >monopoly which displays wine and beer behind locked glass cases. If you >really must buy the horrid stronger stuff, then it's safely stacked away on >shelves behind the counter. No wonder Swedes think it's an exciting >adventure to go into a bright, open, welcoming tax-free shop at the airport >where they are trusted to pick up a bottle of booze and not drink it before >reaching the check-out.

>

>Wine

>

>How do you ask for something if you can't pronounce it? To help Swedes get >their tongues around strange foreign names once they reach the counter, the >Systembolaget's brochure used to contain the phonetic pronunciation of all >the wines on sale. Coteaux de Langedoc became something likekåtå de >långödock which doesn't look at all drinkable. Today, as fully fledged >members of the EU and therefore full-blooded Europeans, Swedes have to >manage without this customer-friendly linguistic help. Mind you, if you ask >for a Californian wine in fluent English, the chances are the assistant >won't understand. They need a Swedish accent.

>

>Beer

>

>Beer in Sweden is classified into four types according to alcohol content.
>This is perhaps best explained by a Swedish business man in a Stockholm >restaurant who had just been told by his Japanese guests that they would >like to drink beer with their meal.

>

>'In Sweden we have beer with different classes. You can have a 'lätt öl' >which is a light, easy beer with no alcohol. You can even drink it at lunch >time. Then you can have a 'people's beer', a folköl, and if you want you can >buy that in shops. We also have in Sweden a mellanöl which is a >'middle-class beer'. Yes and then you have another one, a class 3 one too.
>This is a big, strong one but you have to go to the system company to get >it. But not on Sundays.' I think they then asked for mineral water.

>

>Snaps

>

>If you want to get the Swedes singing then open a bottle of ice-cold snaps - >which is the Swedish word for schnapps. Swedes drink snaps, flavoured with >caraway, aniseed, coriander, fennel and wormwood, with herring (of course) >and crayfish.

>

>You'll please them no end if you, too, were to join in the singing of a >'snapsvisa' (a song which accompanies schnapps).

>

>Here is an English transcription of one of the most famous songs. Grab a >Swede and sing along. Skål!

>

>Hell and gore

>

>Chung hop father Allan Allan lay

>

>Hell and gore

>
>Chung hop father Allan lay
>
>Oh handsome inter hell an tar
>
>Hand hell air inter half an four
>
>Hell and gore!
>
>(Now knock it back in one)
>
>Chung hop father Allan lay
>

>

>

ps

Jan and I lived in a “attic”or garret

- we saw this Church out our window lit up vet night
- magic
- Storykirken in Gamla Stan

>Swedish food

>

>This is delicious. Swedes love anything that is pickled in spice and >vinegar. You pickle it, they'll eat it. Other tasty delicacies include fried >salted herring, marinated herring and more pickled herring. Certain dishes >are associated with particular holidays and times of the year. At Christmas, >the Swedes eat a Christmas ham which is all very nice. They also eat dried >stock fish. Believe it or not this is dried fish soaked in lye. (Are your >mouths watering?). This is followed by cold rice pudding. Yes, you read >correctly.

>

>Swedes get very excited about the advent of new potatoes. There is nothing >like a new potato having just been pulled out of the rich fertile soil of >Scania, southern Sweden. The price per kilo in the first weeks is >prohibitive but after a while normal Swedes, as they all are of course, can >afford what they've all been waiting for. Swedish new potatoes are usually >eaten with chives, sour cream and-yes, you've guessed it, pickled herring.

>

>Once you have tasted pickled herring, salt herring and marinated herring it >is time to try fermented baltic herring. A specialty from the north, the >fish is nowadays tinned. The tins become spherical as the fermentation >continues. To the uninitiated the smell, once the tin has been opened, >reminds you of....

>

>No wonder there are so many MacDonald hamburger joints in Sweden.

>

>No, seriously. Swedish cooking has opened itself up to all manner >of international influences which has led to a Swedish culinary miracle.
>Stockholm restaurants can match anything that Parisians can offer. 'Smaklig >måltid!' which in English means Bon appétit!

>

>The normal Swede

>

>Every Swede should aspire to being normal and average. There's no greater >compliment than to be called an ordinary kind of person. 'To be as people >usually are' is a fine way to describe yourself and you'll instantly earn >others' respect. Successful people are just normal people who have had a >spot of luck - but it won't last. Every Swede can tell you about >'Jantelagen' the law of Jante. This states that you shouldn't think you are >somebody. Somebody who is somebody pretends to be nobody because anybody can >be nobody and nobody would really want to be seen as somebody in the eyes of >anybody. Get it?

>

>The honest Swede

>

>Swedes are basically honest. They don't like cheating. That's a foreign >habit. There are only two occasions when it's acceptable to cheat.
>Joy-riding on the Stockholm underground which is regarded as a kind of >sport, and filling in your income-tax forms which is regarded a necessity.

>

>The silent Swede

>

>Silence is not necessarily negative. Swedes are marvelously reflective and >introvert. To sit and say nothing for an hour is good for the soul. Indeed, >which other nation would sing about the virtues of silence in their national >anthem? 'Du gamla, du fria, du fjällhöga nord. Du tysta, du glädjrika >sköna'. (Ye ancient, ye land of the free, the high fells of the north. Ye >silent, ye glorious beauty).

>

>The Grateful Swede

>

>The Swedes are a very thankful people. They may not have a word for 'please' >but they more than compensate by using the word 'tack' (thank you) in any >number of situations. They say 'tack' or 'tack tack'. The reply is 'tack' or >even 'tack tack'. They say 'tusen tack' if they are particularly grateful >which is a thousand thank yous, and which in English is multiplied by >another thousand to become 'thanks a million'. They say 'tack för maten' >after a meal, which means thank you for the food and they say 'tack för >senast' meaning thank you your hospitality the last time we met. They say >'ja tack' for 'yes please' and 'tack själv' for thank you.

>

>The 'lagom bra' Swede or the Swede who is not too good but, then again, not >so bad either.

>

>The Complete Oxford Dictionary may boast over 650 000 entries to prove that >English is a very wordy language. Swedish, on the other hand, has a smaller >vocabulary, but they compensate by having words for which there is no >English equivalent. Swedes are fond of neither extravagance in any form nor >excesses (except in liquid form). Which is why they have a word like >'lagom', meaning 'just enough' and 'with moderation'. Everything can, and >indeed should be, 'lagom'. What is >absolutely-fanastic-marvellous-way-out-super-terrific to an American is >'lagom bra' to a Swede ('Just about right and nothing to make a fuss >about'). 'Bra' here means 'good' and has nothing to do with lingerie in >medium size. Doing things in moderation means always taking the middle path.

 >If there is a choice between 'ja' and 'nej' the Swedes say 'Nja'. If there >is heartless capitalism on one hand and mindless socialism on the other, the >Swedes develop a 'lagom' sort of compromise called the Swedish Muddle or is >it Model?
 >
 >The safety-conscious Swede
 >
 >Swedes need to feel safe and secure in everything they do. They wear knee >pads, cycle helmets, ear plugs, protective glasses and life-jackets - and >that's when they do the washing up.
 >
 >Patriotism
 >
 >Swedes hang Swedish flags on their Christmas trees. Swedes even wipe their >mouths on the Swedish flag as you'll even find Swedish flags on serviettes >on special occasions. The Swedish flag appears on birthday cards, Christmas >cards and playing cards. The Swedish national day is called the day of the >Swedish flag when you may even find a Swedish flag at the top of a flag-pole.
 >In fact the flag is run up on the slightest excuse. They hoist the flag if >there's a birthday in your family, or indeed in anybody's family. They hoist >it when they are expecting guests, they hoist it on Sundays and public >holidays, and on the king's birthday.
 >
 >They'll hoist it simply because everybody else has hoisted theirs.
 >
 >Immigrants
 >
 >Sweden probably has the highest rate of academics in the cleaning business >and in hotel kitchens. They are all called Hassan and Bogdan. Those looking >for jobs they are more than well qualified for often change their names to >more Swedish sounding names. Hassan becomes Hasse and Bogdan becomes Bengt.
 >This might at least fool the prospective employer on the application form >and they may be called to interview. Of a population of just under 9 >million, there are 1 million immigrants. Sales of peroxide are unusually >high in Sweden.
 >

>Nature

>

>The relationship Swedes have with Nature is particularly difficult to >explain to a foreigner. Swedes are incredibly knowledgeable about plants, >flowers, animals and creepy-crawlies. They not only know the name of the >bird, but they can tell you how it sounds in the morning, where it nests and >from whence it has migrated. Such is their worship of nature, that it is >reflected in their family names. Wouldn't you like to be called 'Aspengrove' >(Asplund), 'Lillyleaf' (Liljeblad), 'Flowertwig' (Blomqvist) and 'Mountain >stream' (Beergström)?

>

>Religion

>

>Swedes gave up being Catholics years ago and adopted Lutheranism. However, >always keen on having any excuse not to work, they kept the Catholic holy >days and made them holidays; Twelfth Night, All Saints Day, Ascension Day.
>Twelfth night is logically called 'The eve of the thirteenth day' in >Swedish. All Saints Day is nowadays translated as 'Halloween' with a Swedish >accent, and Ascension Day was once translated by a Swede as 'The day Jesus >took a flight to heaven'.

>

>Crime and punishment

>

>Major criminals like those omitting to file their income tax returns or >forgetting to pay their bills on time are dealt with severely. Minor >criminals like murderers and those convicted of grievous bodily harm are >told not to do it again.

>

>Swedish Television

>

>God may be watching you. But I doubt whether he watches Swedish television.
>At prime viewing time Swedish television tells you that everything is >dangerous to your health. Don't eat this Don't drink that, don't do that >either. However, the death rate in Sweden is still 100%.

>

>Most of the money from the television license goes towards staging the >Eurovision Song Contest which Sweden insist on winning every third year.

>

>Sport

>

>Swedes excel at sports. There is a nation-wide interest in sports, exercise >and outdoor recreation. There are over 22 000 officially registered sports >clubs, not taking into account the thousands of local clubs, including those >at workplaces. Swedes are justly proud of their famous sportsmen and women - >Björn Borg, Ingemar Stenmark, Ingemar Johansson, Annika Sörenstam to name >but a few.

>
>Their ice-hockey players are so good that most of them have been sold and >exported to major teams in the NHL. Swedes are frequently world champions in >bandy. Then again, it's relatively easy to be world champions in a game >nobody else has ever heard of.
>
>Swedish sex and sin
>
>There isn't any.
>
>Vacation
>
>Swedes take the whole summer off work. They have five weeks paid leave which >they usually take in July. Once a Swede was told he had only five weeks to >live. 'I hope it's in July' he said.
>
>Public holidays
>
>Yes, Sweden has its fair share. But they are not enough. 'Swedes are world >best' (one of their favorite phrases) at finding excuses for not being at >work. They created the 'squeeze day', explained once by a Swede as 'a day >squeezed in between a holiday and a weekend. We have worked for it, so it's >not a free day really'. Translated this means that if there is a public >holiday on, say, the Thursday then they don't think it's worth going into >work just for one day before they're off again at the weekend. The Friday, >in this case, is a squeeze day. They accumulate time by working four minutes >extra every day so they reckon it's not a holiday but time off in lieu of >the overtime. Get it?
>
>If they are lucky, the Swedes can enjoy what can only be described as a >'squeeze week' during the first week of May. There's the weekend, then a >squeeze Monday as Tuesday is the 1st of May and a public holiday. Hopefully >Ascension Day falls on the Thursday so it's no good going to work on the >Wednesday and the Friday is squeezed between Thursday and Saturday and >before you know it it's already the following weekend.
>
>Some Swedish traditional holidays
>
>1.Valborgsmässoafton (Walpurgis night)
>
>This is the evening before the 1st of May public holiday. A metamorphosis >occurs. Like a butterfly emerging from months of lonely darkness in its >cocoon, Swedes wriggle out into the open, stretch and flap their wings. The >winter is officially over, at least according to the calendar, by gathering >outdoors and lighting huge bonfires. From now on, Swedes shed their thick, >cozy winter attire and put on flimsy, brightly-colored, cotton summer wear.

>If the Jews are God's chosen people, then on this night the Swedes are God's >frozen people. Wind, rain, hail and snow abound, so quiteoften the bonfires >don't have a long life-span. The Swedish calendar is not always in tune with >reality.

>

>2. Midsummer

>

>This is celebrated on the weekend coming closest to the real midsummer day, >24th of June. A mass exodus takes place just before with thousands of Swedes >evacuating the towns and cities and heading for their weekend cottages in >the country. They erect a maypole, erect being the operative word as in fact >it is a pagan symbol offertility. It looks like a long thing with two round >dangly bits!

>

>They dress it up in leaves and flowers (the maypole, that is) and then spend >the afternoon dancing around it pretending to be small frogs. It's true.

>

>Swedes eat new potatoes and pickled herring (of course). Before long, it is >not only the herring which is pickled as they do end to imbibe large >quantities of beer and akvavit. No wonder they dance like frogs afterwards.
>Another important dish on the menu is fresh strawberries and cream. No >foreign watery, tasteless EU-regulated strawberries, but large, curvy, >juicy, sweet Swedish ones.

>

>Lucia, 13th of December

>

>Most people have no idea how the Lutheran Swedes came to celebrate the >Sicilian Saint Lucia when even the Sicilians Don't pay her any attention >whatsoever. In Swedish homes, hospitals, old-people's homes, factories and >offices and up the High street, Lucia comes to spread light in the deep >winter darkness - usually long before dawn, which at this time of year is >just before it gets dark again. Little blonde girls, teenage blond girls and >not-so-young-any-more blonde Maj-Britt who works in the accounting >department, dress up in a full length, white gown with a red ribbon around >their waist and become this year's Lucia. Lucia wears a wreath of >lingonberry sprigs on her head and positioned in the wreath are several lit >candles. As only one can be Lucia in each procession, the other less >fortunate dark-haired girls have to walk behind her acting as some kind of >bridesmaid. As Sweden is an extremely egalitarian society, boys (or Per from >the purchasing department) are invited to take part in the procession as >'star boys'. Lucia's henchmen, sort of.

>

>This festival is typically and uniquely Swedish and the song, surprisingly >entitled 'Sankta Lucia', sung by Lucia and her back up group, brings tears >to everyone's eyes. As indeed it should.

>

>The Right of Common Access

>

>Swedes can be proud of many things. ABBA, tennis players and a variety of >pickled herring. One thing that every Swede cherishes very dearly is the >right to roam wherever he wishes on open land and to pick flowers, berries >and mushrooms in forests and fields and to go swimming and boating in lakes >and the sea. You are not allowed to pitch your tent in someone's back garden >and you are not allowed to pick flowers from someone's flower beds. Likewise >you are not allowed to climb over any fence enclosing a private home and you >are certainly not allowed to take growing trees, bushes, bark, leaves, >acorns or nuts. However, the right of common access does allow you to swat >as many swarms of mosquitoes as is humanly possible - for the common good.

>

>Swedish small talk

>

>Swedes call this 'cold talk' or 'dead talk' which more or less sums up their >opinion of it. Not being first in the queue when God dished out >conversational talent, Swedes limit themselves to one major topic of >conversation - the weather. Sweden is so large that it has all kinds of >weather at once which is very convenient as there is always something to >talk about.

>

>Swedish conversation

>

>When Swedes say something, they mean exactly what they say. No more, no >less. There is usually no hidden meaning and they don't have to read between >the lines. There are few fantastic metaphores in daily conversation, and >exaggeration, a string of vivid adjectives and enhancing repetitions are >often viewed with suspicion. Try retelling something that happened and >embroider a little to make the story more stimulating. After a while the >Swede will correct you as your version is beginning to stray from what >really happened. 'And then there were loads of people who', 'There were five >people' says Sven. 'And then after half an hour they came and', '20 minutes' >says Sven 'They came after 20 minutes'. Elaborate story-telling has never >been possible in Sweden

>

>Swedes are extremely good listeners. Sometimes it's difficult to tell >whether they are thinking about what you said or if they have mentally gone >to lunch - but they are listening to every word. The marvelous thing is they >don't interrupt. Interrupting is a sign of bad manners. They patiently wait >for their turn to express themselves concisely and precisely. Sometime they >have to wait for rather a long time. Especially when meeting with >foreigners.

>

>Swedish women sometimes sound as if they have a breathing complaint. When >they agree, they breathe in and say 'jahhhh'. Or they inhale and say >'nejhhhh'. They are not about to pass out in an asthma attack. They are just >participating in the conversation.

>
>Swedes have a tendency to state the obvious. If you meet an acquaintance in >a shop he'll probably say 'Oh, so you're out shopping'. Or, if you meet >somebody you know out strolling in the countryside he'll say 'Oh, so you're >out walking'. The temptation is to say 'No, I'm playing the piano' but >don't. Sarcasm doesn't go down too well.
>
>Swedish discussion
>
>Being neutral and avoiders of conflict, the Swedes are careful not to >express an opinion which may cause heated discussion. Ask a Swede what his >opinion is he'll probably answer 'It depends'. He won't actually tell you >what it depends on as that might lead to a debate and then you have to take >sides. Hundreds of years of neutrality has taught him not to take sides - >well at least not until he knows who's going to win.
>
>The Swedish language
>
>'Hej' - the word for hello and good-bye is the same. It's difficult to know >whether people are coming or going.
>
>'Gift' - the word for married is the same word as for poison. This probably >could explain the high divorce rate.
>
>'Sex' - the word for six is the same for sex, which gives a 'six-pack' a >whole new meaning.
>
>'Oväder' - the word for stormy weather is, literally translated,
>'unweather'. And I would have thought it was very much weather.
>
>'Sambo' - you live and sleep together with your partner but are not married, >well at least not to that particular partner.
>
>'Särbo' - you sleep with your partner and then go home to your own bed >afterwards.
>
>'A-laget' - in Swedish, the 'A-team' is a group of hopeless alcoholics >hanging outside the state liquor store. Not the kind you'd want in the >national basketball team in other words.
>
>'Osvensk' - the word 'un-Swedish' mostly has a positive connotation! A >recent book review stated 'It's an exciting thriller, entertaining, has >colorful characters, lots of action and imagination and very un-Swedish to >name but a few positive qualities'.

>
>It's unbelievable, but true! Can you imagine a Frenchman using the word
>'un-French' as a positive quality?
>
>Swedish English (Swenglish)
>
>Although the Swedes generally have a very good command of the english >language, sometimes they just don't get it right.
>
>'Please take off your clothes and follow me to the whip room.'
>
>(Translation: May I take your coat and accompany you to the VIP room)
>
>'She's away with the VD.'
>
>(Translation: She's away with the Managing Director) (VD =Managing Director)
>
>'His name is Öberg, a zero with two pricks.'
>
>(Translation: The letter 'o' with two dots = ö) (prickar = dots)
>
>'You'll have to show your leg before entering'
>
>(Translation: You'll have to show identification before entering.) (leg = >id)
>
>'Please keep hanging on the line'
>
>(Translation: Please continue to hold the line)
>
>'Thank you for the last time'
>
>(Translation: Thank you for your hospitality.)
>
>'Can I follow you to the big mess in Stockholm?'
>
>(Translation: May I come with you to the large fair in Stockholm?) (mässa = >fair)
>
>'He has many balls up in the air'
>
>(Translation: He is involved in many different projects.) (att ha bollar i >luften = Swedish saying)
>
>A lesson in Swedish
>

>The Swede is a person of few words.
>
>Eng: Excuse me, I didn't quite catch what you were saying.
>
>Swe: Va? (vah?) Literal translation: What?
>
>Eng: Sorry for bumping into you like that. So terribly clumsy of me.
>
>Swe: Oj! (oi!) Literal translation: Oh!
>
>Eng: It's you! How lovely to see you!
>
>Swe: Nej, men! (nay men) Literal translation: No, but!
>
>Eng: How are things with you?
>
>Swe: Annars? (an ass) Literal translation: Otherwise?
>
>Eng: Excuse me, may I disturb you for a second?
>
>Swe: Du Literal translation: You
>
>Eng: Could I have a pint of your best bitter please.
>
>Swe: En stor stark Literal translation: A big strong one
>
> Eng: Shall we treat ourselves and indulge in a schnapps?
>
>Swe: En liten djävul? (en liten yayvull) Literal translation: A little >devil?
>
>However sometimes English is just that bit more concise:
>
>Eng: Mind the gap!
>
>Swe: Tänk på avståndet mellan vagn och plattform när ni stiger av.
>
>Literal translation: Think of the gap between the carriage and the platform >when you alight.
>
>-----Original Message-----